

Towards Reliable Machine Learning

Masashi Sugiyama

When training and deploying machine learning systems in the real world, we face several types of uncertainty. For example, the available training data may contain insufficient information, label noise, and bias. In this talk, I will give an overview of our research on reliable machine learning, including weakly supervised classification, noisy label classification, and transfer learning. Finally, possible future directions are discussed.